Transmyocardial revascularization is a surgical treatment for patients with chronic myocardial ischemia. The left ventricular ischemic zone is revascularized with strips of thinned muscle that creates a new blood supply to the ischemic myocardium. Quadriceps femoris muscle stimulation is used to prevent postoperative atrial fibrillation in high-risk patients with defibrillation devices. The aim of this study was to evaluate the acute effect of 8-10 minutes of quadriceps femoris muscle stimulation on regional myocardial blood flow and ischemic injury in a porcine model of transmyocardial revascularization. Twenty Yorkshire pigs underwent left anterior descending coronary artery ligation and were assigned randomly into control or quadriceps femoris stimulation groups. During cardiopulmonary bypass, transmyocardial revascularization was performed in the control group. Stimulation was performed in the quadriceps femoris group for 8-10 minutes using alternating bursts of 100 Hz, alternating 50 Hz, 3

If it is not possible to be online when you need it, does not it follow that there is no need for an IP address? "chuckling All I can say is that I didn't get a LinkedIn invite so it's a possibility. We get 10Mb/s at home so I think the average speed on an ADSL line is something like 30-40KB/s. If it is not possible to be online when you need it, does not it follow that there is no need for an IP address? Yes, we all know that to be online all you need is a connection to the network and an IP address. But what you mean is the IP address and the quality of connection you have to actually make it work. If you can't be online because of a poor quality connection you won't have much of a problem I guess. What I want to know is this: Why does everyone think they are owed a connection with the same quality and speed as everyone else - and charged what the majority of the company's customers pay? You want to be able to stream a movie. The average speed of a cable/DSL connection is between 30 - 40KB/s. This is not 'fast' and it doesn't offer the instant streaming you want.
