Free’s an amazing adjective to describe how I feel about this. I’m excited. Exploding really. It’s been a few years since I was a free bird. I know that the freedom of independence in the digital space is what I’m eternally (and ontologically) searching for. The fever, the feelings, the metaphorical freedom that I hoped that I’d one day indulge in was lost to the endless battles with corporate zombies (at least that’s how I felt at the time). But, one thing I know for sure is that the best way to get back to being a free bird is to work for yourself (well, I hope so at least). Thankfully, I’ve found a few resources to help me get to this point in my career and found myself in the arms of a huge company called VigLink. I just had to share my experience with you. I’ve had the pleasure of working with their team over the past few months (and they are an awesome group of people) so this post is more of an overview of what I’ve been working on, rather than an attempt to get a raise (although that would be a nice side benefit). Viglink and the position I was offered I was working full time at a NYC based web design agency when I was offered the job at VigLink. I was originally excited about the position (mostly because my code review was in the “meh” department) but, once I started, I started wanting to ask them about something related to the job. What’s more, they weren’t having any issues with it. I was given instructions, I was welcomed, I was given links to their privacy policy, and my advisor was there to help me figure out what I needed to learn. Yeah, I said advisor. The weird thing was that I didn’t really care that my code review wasn’t in the high “wow” category; it was in the “meh” category. I don’t mean that in a bad way at all. In fact, I was thrilled that I was assigned to a project with a small scope. It allowed me to 0cc13bf012

Clinical symptoms of MS can vary from mild to severe and are characterized by progressive neurological deterioration. A number of clinical features are associated with the course of MS, including the appearance of new or recurrent lesions on MRI scans. Patients with more active MS have higher numbers of T cells in the brain and spinal cord compared to patients with less active MS ([@B1]). Several studies using murine EAE models indicate that the numbers of T cells that access the CNS are influenced by the entry of these cells into the vascular compartment. A reduced number of cells in the vascular compartment can have several potential origins: (i) fewer cells penetrate the blood-brain barrier in the course of MS disease; (ii) fewer cells enter the CNS during the acute phase of the disease; (iii) due to the altered distribution of T cells in the CNS, the same numbers of cells are present in the CNS but the number of cells that enter the CNS is reduced. In patients with MS, progressive tissue damage is accompanied by a progressive infiltration of the tissue with inflammatory cells, including T cells. Alterations in the blood-tissue barrier are likely to occur at later stages of the disease when the number of inflammatory cells is higher and, therefore, T cells may enter the tissue at an increased rate, aggravating the infiltration. In fact, reduction of blood-brain barrier leakage precedes the decline in blood T cells and lymphocytes in the cerebrospinal fluid ([@B2]), indicating that the increase in blood T cells may reflect the progressive infiltration of T cells into the CNS. The degree of infiltration into the CNS is not solely dependent on the amount of T cells in the blood but is also modulated by the migratory pattern of these cells. Interestingly, patients with
