This invention relates generally to scroll fluid compressors, such as used in refrigeration systems, and more specifically to preventing the build-up of solid or gaseous material on the inner surface of the scroll which may interfere with the proper operation of the compressor. Scroll-type fluid compressors comprise two scroll members each having a curved, generally spiral scroll wrap. Each pair of scroll wraps defines a compression chamber therebetween which progressively decreases in size as the scroll members move towards each other. During operation of the scroll-type compressor, compressed gas is discharged from the compression chamber through an axial passage between the scroll members. In order to provide for efficient operation of a scroll-type compressor, and to enhance the cooling efficiency of a refrigeration system using such a compressor, it is known to drive the scroll members of the compressor at speeds generally exceeding 7,000 revolutions per minute. At such speeds, the compressor generates a large amount of vibration which may cause the wall of the piston to rub against the bearing which is provided to support the scroll members of the compressor. Such rubbing is known to cause the build-up of solid or gaseous materials, including lubricating oil, on the inner surface of the bearing. If sufficient build-up of solid or gaseous material is allowed to accumulate on the bearing, the displacement efficiency of the bearing, and thus its ability to properly support the compression chamber and the scroll members, is substantially reduced. More significantly, however, any build-up of solid or gaseous material on the bearing may actually cause failure of the compressor, either by causing the piston to be drawn out of its normal path of travel, or by causing seizure of the scroll members.
