major objective of this project is to define the role of the inhibitory G-protein Gi3 in the muscarinic actions on cholinergic transmission in the rat neostriatum. This will be done by examining the effects of direct inactivation of the enzyme and removal of G-protein on muscarinic receptor mediated responses. The proposed research will focus on three specific actions of muscarinic agonists in this brain region: (a) inhibition of K-conductance; (b) enhancement of Ca²⁺ currents; and (c) enhancement of dopamine release. The experiments are designed to identify mechanisms by which these actions can be blocked. Drugs will be administered locally in the neostriatum by iontophoresis and the effects of the drugs on the target cell electrophysiology and the release of dopamine will be monitored in the ventral tegmental area of the brain, with a microdialysis probe. The experiments will determine the role of Gi3 in mediating the muscarinic regulation of the three effects, and will examine the possibility that muscarinic regulation of dopamine release is mediated by a different Gi subtype. These studies will include measurements of adenylate cyclase activity and adenylate cyclase response to GTP analogues and the possibility that adenylate cyclase is directly activated by muscarinic receptor-Gi coupling. The involvement of Gi3 in muscarinic regulation of the K-current and dopamine release will be tested by determining whether inactivation of the Gi3 protein reduces the effects. The results of these experiments will help to define the role of G-proteins in the regulation of intracellular pathways by cholinergic inputs in the neostriatum, and will provide new insights into the regulation of the striatal output by the cholinergic system.
