changes. This invention relates to a system for cleaning and/or disinfecting and/or sterilizing a room, and in particular, to an apparatus and method for cleaning, disinfecting, and sterilizing hospital rooms for infectious diseases. In the past, conventional hospital rooms have been cleaned and sterilized by an individual with a manually operated high pressure nozzle. This method generally requires the manual cleaning and disinfection of an average sized patient room, including the floor and the walls, which is an extremely time consuming, labor intensive process. If the surface was not properly cleaned prior to the disinfection, there was no assurance that the disinfectant had reached all surfaces of the room. To clean the room the individual used a brush and disinfectant solution. If not used properly, the disinfectant would not work and the room would not be disinfected. If the disinfectant solution was too strong, the room would not be completely cleaned. The high pressure nozzle of the conventional hospital room cleaning system would spray disinfectant solution into the room, while scrubbing the floor with a brush. This would then be followed by an additional scrubbing of the walls with a brush. A second individual or operator would then begin the disinfection by repeating the same procedure. All of the steps were then repeated. Since there was no automatic means for loading the disinfectant solution into the high pressure nozzle, the disinfectant solution had to be mixed prior to the room
