Viruses naturally utilize membrane vesicles as selective trafficking devices. In their envelopes they possess peptides rich in amino acids that form strong interaction spots with the membrane that are referred to as viroporins. Viroporins enable the viruses to break the membrane barrier by disintegrating the lipid bilayer which contains them. In their natural habitat, viruses encounter plenty of biopolymers like DNA, RNA or proteins from the host cells. They can use them for protection or to adapt their surface properties to their environment. In the 1980s, abzymes have been discovered that are specific for almost any kind of nucleic acid. While phages are able to replicate their genome, several viruses transcribe and translate their genome but lack the enzymatic ability to transcribe and translate their own genome. By using the base sequence of the phage genome a fraction of the phage that are produced gains the ability to transcribe and translate the complementary host genome. Among viral genetic elements, the coat proteins of the herpes simplex virus are also discussed as strong candidates for abzymes. This study shows how abzymes that originated from different viruses can target different biological molecules. This strategy is called directed evolution and is used in the generation of biocatalysts or bioprobes. It is done by introducing random mutations into the structural elements of a protein followed by either screening the reactions for enzyme activity
