In previous publications, we reported that apolipoprotein E (apoE) polymorphism in Alzheimer disease (AD) is significantly different in North-Eastern (NE) and North-Western (NW) European populations. Here we report on the existence of a similar ethnic variation in apolipoprotein D (apoD) polymorphism in AD and a less pronounced of risk susceptibility. The present case-control study investigated the frequency of apoD alleles (D2, D3) in individuals with AD and compared these alleles with those of normal elderly. Genomic DNA extracted from peripheral blood of 66 AD individuals and 100 normal controls were analysed for presence of ApoD alleles using primers D1-D2 and D2-D3. The results were analysed in terms of ethnic variation, gender effect, disease stage, and ApoE genotypes. Allelic frequencies of the D2 and D3 apoD genes were 0.81 and 0.19 in normal elderly and 0.82 and 0.18 in AD. A significant ethnic variation in allelic distribution was found in AD, with frequencies of D2 and D3 alleles in NE population being 0.85 and 0.15, respectively, while in NW population the frequencies were 0.79 and 0.21 (p = 0.007) for D2 and D3 alleles, respectively. The risk of disease, when D2 and D3 alleles are present in combination, was 1.9 times higher (95% CI, 1.4-3.1) than when they were absent (p = 0.0005). Gender effect revealed that the
