===== On July 2, 2013, researchers from NASA's Dawn mission swooped down to the south pole of the dwarf planet Ceres and turned their camera lenses inward to record a breathtaking vista of the surface (Fig. 1{ref-type="fig"}). We are only just beginning to understand the youngest and most varied world on the solar system's Inner Oort Cloud. The home of organic molecules on the surface of Ceres is just one of numerous unanswered questions left to be addressed by current space missions (Fig. 2{ref-type="fig"}). How did Ceres get to be the size it is today? What role has gravity played in the process? Where do we go from here? NASA launched Dawn in March 2009 to explore Vesta, the second largest asteroid in the solar system, and Ceres, the largest. Since their discovery in 1801 and 1802, respectively, the two worlds have mystified astronomers. Dawn's cameras have captured eight vastly differing terrains on the surface of two bodies, observing them all and exploring the geologic processes that reshaped them. Over its second, and final, long mapping orbit of Vesta, Dawn's cameras recorded some of the most detailed images ever taken in deep space (Fig. 3{ref-type="fig"}). With the orbit completing in August 2015, Dawn must now find its way home to its next
