In this app I want to get the data of the table "log". It has 3 columns named type, message, and timestamp. One of the task of the app is making a random picture every time it is open, and I want to make a copy of picture each time it's closed. So how can I get an array of the objects from this table? A: You can get the array using the below query. But you should be careful to maintain your database. Select * from Log Q: Would a cat with 3 eyes trained as a hunting cat be more successful than it's standard form? I have a young male cat whom I've only ever had 1 eye. I had been hoping to train it, but after the recent birth of his sister and a slight delay in her birth meant that the cat was quite young when I first decided to train him, she has outgrown it. I decided that I would try to train both of them together, and so I recently got a cat. I put it in with this one, and figured that they would train together. I placed the collar on him and put a training collar on her. We ran around for a while, and at about half an hour into it, he saw that she had a collar, so didn't pay any more attention to her. At the end of it, he didn't pick up anything from her. My question is, would training both of them together be more helpful? Will he be more likely to catch birds if he had both of his eyes trained? A: I don't know about this kind of training but I've trained a cat with a blind eye. Initially I thought it would make training really difficult but I wasn't so sure because of the whole cat using sonar detection thing. It's not really a cat sighted on objects but more a cat using sound. But with a blind eye, a lot of that comes naturally. The cat can still smell the object but without the sight, it's a lot harder to see. Also without eyesight, the cat cannot see the track at the end of the

Susan BANKS, Appellant. No. 43,388-KA. Court of Appeal of Louisiana, Second Circuit. May 6, 2008. *640 Carey J. Ellis, III, Lafayette, for Appellant. Paul J. Carmouche, District Attorney, John Ford McWilliams, III, Cory P. Leblanc, Bastrop, for Appellee. Before GASKINS, DREW and MOORE, JJ. MOORE, J. The defendant, Susan Banks, was convicted of two counts of distribution of cocaine, La. R.S. 40:967, after a jury trial in August 2006. She received sentence to 10 years at hard labor on each count to be served concurrently. This appeal followed. For the reasons stated, we affirm her convictions but remand for resentencing. FACTS On December 4, 2005, approximately one ounce of cocaine was seized from the defendant's purse after she was stopped for speeding. The defendant told the trooper that the cocaine belonged to her boyfriend, who was in the car with her. The following day, the defendant asked the trooper if he would allow her to retrieve her purse so she could give the cocaine to her mother. The trooper agreed. The trooper received the defendant's purse and again searched it for drugs. He found that the defendant's wallet contained a piece of paper and

A lock is a special file that hides your personal information. You create a lock and give it a name. When you open the lock and it requires a password to be decrypted, you enter the password and access your data. You can encrypt your personal information to make it easily accessible for when you need it, but not easily readable.... Somewhat vintage dashboard Somebody uploads a video on Facebook to share with friends, which is meant to be private. But instead, it's happily archived online for all to see. It could be video of your family's yearly vacation, your child's first steps, or even yourself in a drunken state. With new social networks like Facebook and Twitter, it's getting easier than ever for privacy-conscious users to keep their content contained. And now, there's a new Google+ feature to share your photos, videos, and other content with the same privacy level. Google+ launched a new feature that will allows users to control who can see their posts. Called "Threaded comments," the service will let users control who sees a post before it's shared in Google's social network. Google+ users can enable the "Threaded comments" feature for their photos and videos by opening the photo or video and clicking on the "Share" option in the top-right menu. A "Threaded comments" preview pops up, which allows the user to make comments above or below the original photo or video. To share a photo or video, tap the share button and the "Threaded comments" preview pops up to let the user choose whether to share their comment with just friends, friends of friends, or the public. This means only people who the user has shared photos or videos with will be able to view the comment. And while this new feature gives the user more control over sharing content, it does not allow the user to edit their photos before sharing. The option for editing photos and videos before sharing in Google+ does not yet exist. But the new feature is a great way to keep photos and videos from becoming miscellaneous public items. Google+ first launched the feature when it revealed its Android+OS for tablets and smartphones at Google I/O. Google+ users can control their posts' visibility, down to the individual comment level. The user can decide whether to allow comments to appear on their posts, and whether those comments can be publicly posted on Google+ by other users. For instance, a user who has posted a vacation photo to Google+ can make comments regarding that
