We also have 8 new practices for Ultimate Teams that focus on training up your core attributes: Training Keepers Training Attacking Training Skill Training Goalkeeping Training Passing Training Fouls Training Transition Training Midfield Training To address the player fatigue that comes from training certain attributes, we've improved the training demands of the full kits and compared it to the training demands of the basic and advanced versions. In previous versions of the game, we used to train these attributes on the basic kits since the game was meant to be played on a game-day basis, which led to the training demands being too high. So, the Elite and Basic kits were the only ones that could contain all players that you could expect to see in a full-scale football match. However, with the introduction of the Full kits, we introduced a new training scheme to take into account player fatigue from training the full-game kits. Since you can't train the full-game kits in a one-day period, we've reduced the training demands on the Full kits while training for the semi-final and final of an international tournament using the Basic and Advanced kits. We believe that this enables players to train for a match-day tournament using the Full kits, which are their normal pitch-side ready kit that they always train with during the week. Training (90min/session) Elite (5 players per role per division) (5 players per role per division) Basic (8 players per role per division) (8 players per role per division) Full (9 players per role per division) Take a look at the training demands of the Full kits, compared to the training demands of the Basic and Advanced kits and you'll see why it's more efficient to only use Full kits for a full-scale tournament. What's an example of a player's fatigue from using the Full kits? As a goalkeeper, it would be very hard to train every day with the full game kits. Given how much they train with the full game kits on a game-day basis, goalkeepers are now able to perform a training session with the full game kits and specialised goalkeeper equipment, and still be ready for a game-day if they are unfortunate to miss a few days of training with it.
