The authenticity of the data is shown in game match situations, in which it can be used to change situations such as setting up scoring chances or driving an attacking line forward, and to animate team-wide and individual player actions. HyperMotion Technology applies weight to the position of each player as they move through space, and the footwork associated with movements like dribbles, sprints and passes to take advantage of this position-based animation. Players can be seen in scenes in natural movement, similar to that of life, allowing for greater immersiveness in the experience. The official trailer for FIFA 22 explores all of the features of the new interactive technology. Development teams will be able to use the data gathered during the technology trials in order to create new player animations and immersive gameplay experiences. In the announcement video FIFA 22 puts forth the words, “One game doesn't fit all.” In other words, the video game’s new E3 experience makes a pitch for a game that breaks free of the restrictions of 2D gameplay. But where does FIFA continue to rule? In any event, EA has broken new ground in the goal scoring department. Using a combination of physical tracking technology and data fed to the engine by Microsoft's Azure cloud platform, FIFA 22 will allow players to score virtual goals without a realistic soccer ball. (A similar technique was used to score the goals for Quantum Break.) If the goal is scored via a goal-line slide the ball will be kicked towards the goal post; if the player gets close to the post the ball will be flung there. Bend it like Beckham

Another feature making its presence felt at EA's E3 presentation this year is the introduction of motion capture animation for FIFA's players. Previous FIFA titles have used performance capture to great effect, and EA's announcement video uses the technology to great effect. Soccer players can now take leaps, bend, kick, and slide towards the goal without their movements simply being a virtual animation. Players have a range of motion in which to move, and the animation shows just what it feels like to perform these movements. The kicker is that every frame of animation is determined by real movements that players are making. The best part of this presentation is something new to sports games: goal kicks. On-screen movements for the simulation of a player kicking the ball will now have a component that allows the animation to

for the new generation of consoles, and it's only natural that we wanted to deliver a game that is completely different from last year's FIFA 19. We've set out to take everything from the core gameplay experience - including things like being able to dribble past defenders and taking the shot, decision making and situational awareness, as well as everything related to the touch of the ball - and put it all on a level that players have never experienced before. We've aimed to go even deeper than ever before in every area: team strategy, tactics, and gameplay through the course of an entire season. We've also built a robust simulation engine that is able to simulate all the elements of the new game over ten times faster than last year. It's safe to say that from the bottom up, the gameplay experience is better than it has ever been before, and the new generation of consoles means that we were able to introduce game-changing technologies into the gameplay that we've never seen before.
