FIFA 20 introduced an in-depth physical model and active animation, but the first incarnation of the feature was not deployed with a complete football match. After the FIFA Game Awards 2018 at E3 2018, we discovered a limited amount of technology was available to use in game. Because of this, we were unable to improve the model and therefore the end results were unpolished. This year we have been able to merge the Physique model with data directly from 22 players and apply the feature to the full-intensity, 90 minute match from the FIFA Team Series tournament. The goal of our gameplay improvements in Fifa 22 Cracked Version is to bring the game's biomechanics and animations to the next level. We have used our vision and motion capture data to build a more robust character mesh and animations that represent the best of real world player movements. We also improved the animations on the ball, ball contact, stamina, and ball physics. We improved the player collision response and collision animations, to represent the best of real life. With the addition of motion capture data we are able to greatly enhance the players specific animations and skills including: Precision and anticipation Aspects of character motion capture that have a direct effect on how fast you can react, such as speed, agility and body rotation are all directly influenced by the player motion capture data. Note: When we improve the physics of the model, we are able to impact the collision response more accurately and produce more realistic collisions with the environment. Ball physics In order to enhance the ball physics, we used the player motion capture data to influence how the ball behaves both during play and in the air. As a result, the physics now make the ball behave differently depending on the surface of the playing field, along with the various weather and ball conditions. Ball motion The ball motion has been evolved to be more realistic and detailed than ever before. The player motion captures were used as the basis for the ball's movement, showing how the player reacts to the ball based on where they are on the field. This was especially true during dynamic shots and passes where players move out of the way of the ball and change their own direction. Ball motion has been improved with more accurate and detailed artificial intelligence control. As the ball moves through the air, it will now behave more realistically; a higher level of accuracy in how the physics
