EA SPORTS FIFA is the #1 selling and FIFA 22 which is the sequel to FIFA 19 will be on store shelves on September 27th 2018 in North America and September 29th in Europe. The one thing that EA SPORTS FIFA series has stood out since the first game was launched in 1994 is how accurate the physics modeling was. Until FUT (FIFA Ultimate Team) came out the FIFA games were the only console series to game the physics without having the club and league data before the match. In FIFA 19 I began to see the improved physics model showing up in the actual games. A perfect example of this is the new "Fluid Dribbling" mechanic. It's one of the very few times in any sports game that dribbling is executed the way it's supposed to. In the past the dribble was always an imitation of a more realistic dribble, where you don't just burst through the defender but instead move smoothly and take your time with it. One I also noticed in the last couple of games is the new "get to the by-line" which is when you slip past a defender and make it to the space between the defender and the goal. The game is physics based, but not so much that you will have to just hand-hold the analog stick to take more shots. In FIFA 19 it felt a bit off in terms of controlling the ball and tracking it. This was not the case in FUT where it could be a bit inaccurate at times but this was more noticeable in the skill games where it is crucial to keep the ball close to you in order to execute the perfect pass. FIFA 22 is better in this aspect. It also seems like FUT FIFA physics feel a bit more accurate, but I've only played a handful of matches and I haven't done any real stats to compare. If you're into realism then I'd recommend FIFA 19 to you. Last but not least what do I expect? The game includes a new camera and new "Smart Player 2.0" graphics engine. Like always I'm pretty excited for the new stuff. It also includes a new camera and new "Smart Player 2.0" graphics engine. Like always I'm pretty excited for the new stuff.
