A search for malignant neoplasms of the skin was conducted in an isolated, old-growth rain forest in northern Queensland, Australia, where the occurrence of primary skin neoplasms among Aborigines is exceptionally high. All hospital and mortuary records of skin cancer cases in the region and of skin cancer deaths in the region for 5 years were reviewed, and in addition, all skin cancers seen in the 5 years between 1972 and 1976 and reported to the Cancer Registry were included. An approximate total of 100 individuals with skin cancers was identified. Subsequent microscopic study of these skin cancers has confirmed that almost all of them were primary carcinomas. Only two biopsies were found to be primary squamous cell carcinomas. This was considered to be a good survival rate since most primary skin cancers are not diagnosed in the initial stages due to the rarity of this disease. It is also possible that the true number of primary skin cancers was underestimated, since certain types of carcinomas, particularly small cell squamous carcinomas, are often not diagnosed clinically. Skin neoplasms in Aborigines are rare in European populations, but their occurrence among the Aborigines is similar to that of African-Americans and other underserved minorities.Update | Russian anti-missile system deployed in Iran 3 Min Read A Russian radar is seen on top of the T-50 radar tower during a joint test-firing of the air-launched and ground-based missile systems at the test site near Plesetsk in the Arkhangelsk region in this picture taken February 11, 2018.
