What is the most efficient way to write to a child thread from a parent thread? Should I be calling some kind of queue for this? Is this the best way to go about it? Thanks in advance! A: As the comments say, you generally should be using a synchronization mechanism on the operating system. If the operating system provides such a mechanism, then you should use it. For example, Microsoft provides a thread synchronization mechanism as a class called CriticalSection. You can lock/unlock sections of memory when you need to modify data protected by a section of code: CriticalSection cs; //... cs.EnterCriticalSection(); //... cs.LeaveCriticalSection(); The typical way to communicate between threads is to post a message to a queue, and some thread periodically receives that message and reads from it. If the messages can be associated with a particular thread, this can have the advantage of allowing the reader to handle the message specifically. It's important to note that there are many different ways to implement this model. The advantage of one approach over another depends on the exact application requirements. In this case, the key considerations seem to be: Do you need a
