One of the basic assumptions of the postmodern approach to education is that a key part of the teacher's pedagogical role is to make the "students" see things differently. That's the idea behind the new and trendy educational methods of "discovery learning" and "open ended inquiry", that can be seen in "flipped classrooms", "project based learning", and "free writing". One might be tempted to think that these things are only good and fine for college classes and high school classrooms. However, in the sports arena, these methods are used quite commonly by public schools and private Christian schools as well. But before we can jump into the specifics, what are these methods actually all about? First, let's review some of the basic teachings that we have already explored on this blog: "The fight is

I have a dataset with a few variables. Some of these variables are of mixed types (char, float, int, etc.) In the data file I have a few (5-8) separate columns for each variable with one row per variable. My datasets are not very large, around 5000 rows. The variables have been concatenated within the same line and separated by ';' delimiter, with each variable separated by brackets (usually []) to indicate its type: target = as.factor(c(rep(1, 3), rep(2, 3))) [1] 1 1 2 2 id = as.factor(c(1, 1, 2, 2, 1, 1, 2, 2)) [1] 1 1 2 2 1 2 2 1 2 2 time = as.numeric(c(4, 4, 4, 4, 3, 3, 3, 3)) [1] 4 4 4 4 3 3 3 3 temp = as.numeric(c(30, 30, 30, 30, 29, 29, 29, 29)) [1] 30 30 30 30 29 29 29 29 I also need to remove the brackets in order to use the data in R (and later also for a machine learning problem). I know there has to be a way to do this using a loop, but I would like to make my code more efficient. I'm also not very advanced with Python, so any help will be appreciated. So far I've tried this: file_data = ncol(example_table) file_data = file_data[-1] file_data = unlist(file_data, use.names=FALSE) But it only worked for the first line of my dataset and then I got an error regarding too many arguments. I also tried using read.table() in R, but again, I had 0cc13bf012
