The World Health Organization recommends that all individuals with a positive tuberculin skin test (TST) should be treated by isoniazid. To use the TST appropriately, the optimal method to obtain TST results is important. Interferon-gamma release assays (IGRA) are a group of immunological tests that are becoming an alternative to TST for the diagnosis of tuberculosis infection. There are still limited data on their use in clinical practice for tuberculosis screening in developing countries. To compare the sensitivity and specificity of TST and two commercial IGRA (QuantiFERON-TB Gold and QuantiFERON-TB Gold In-Tube) for the diagnosis of tuberculosis in India. Participants were recruited from primary care clinics in seven sites across India. Participants were at least 18 years old, had no history of receipt of isoniazid and completed a questionnaire. Of the 1311 participants who underwent TST, 302 participants underwent IGRA and the results were available for 211 of these participants. Although the sensitivity of both IGRA tests in detecting tuberculosis infection (based on culture results) was very low [1.8-2.7%; 95% CI (confidence interval): 0.7-4.8%], the specificity was similar between the two IGRA tests (95.2-96.3%, 95% CI: 94.1-96.7%). From the results of the multivariate analyses, the presence of either a TST or IGRA result was positively associated with tuberculosis infection (P
