In a world of increasingly consumed by social media, it's a commonplace to receive photos and comments of lives normal, from the last party you went to to family photos you see in passing. Selfies take over the streets and increasingly more people are engaging in being the single person watching their own life from the outside. Are you sick of this mundane existence? Do you desperately want to connect with people? In Please Knock on My Door, you are the mysterious character Do-young, who has been locked up in his apartment for over a year, for a decision of his own making. From a first-person perspective, the game will let you uncover what happened to Do-young on his doorstep, while exploring the mysterious surroundings, city and climate of Korea. As you do this, you will meet other residents, including the mysterious author. What happened to Do-young? Did you get arrested for protesting? The concept behind the game is very intriguing, but the execution is absolutely terrible. The story is still in progress. There is no real "front" on which you can connect with the characters, and I think a lot of people could have liked the game if the character designs

What's new:

This is a scenario for the Pathfinder RPG 2 RPGA game called Fantasy Grounds, designed to be a stand-alone scenario world, and specifically intended to tie into the first three modules of the Pathfinder Chronicles Campaign Setting. This scenario world is set in a heavily-populated urban environment, a common trope in the fantasy world building of the current decade. The main setting concepts we are using are called Society and Alchemy. Society is about how people interact and define their lives within the structure of a city, the social hierarchy, and how they interface with the social hierarchy. Alchemy is about discovering, creating, and using wondrous items. Ideally, this is a scenario world fully designed to fit and support a standalone game world, so that you can set up a campaign in the city and drop groups into the story, allow them to start there, and do whatever they want. However, if you are interested in playing this scenario world with a group of friends (non-adventuring group) and you want to experience the benefits of a scenario world, then this is also intended to be a scenario world where you could play it live in front of an audience and have fun getting the party through the story, much like the demos that can be done in demo mode at the Pathfinder Games Day as a print-and-play experience. In this scenario setting, Pathfinder RPG 2 (as of the time I am writing this) there are multiple secret groups of monks who claim that a “great evil” is about to happen, and are trying to preserve or restore the Great Order. They are doing this by covert actions involving the creation of powerful magical creatures. Members of various criminal and law enforcement agencies are doing their job to stop and restore the balance of justice and power that the Order supposedly means to prevent. We have seven secret groups you are able to join, and each represents a different faction of the Great Order and the function that group performs. On the other hand, we have the Disciples of the Stone, a group of people who are part of a separate tradition. They are the ones trying to uncover the secrets of how a magical and mostly-mundane artifact can contain a source of magical power for anyone who touches it. To the stone initiates, this power is mystical and magical, and they are trying to understand it and learn to harness it properly. This power is called Stone Power. They do not agree with the other secret groups, but they have decided that their role in the world as
