The development of surgical, chemical, and radiotherapeutic modalities for the treatment of malignant liver tumors is being enhanced with the use of ancillary diagnostic techniques, such as dynamic magnetic resonance imaging and intratumor chemotherapy, which can be employed to predict the sensitivity of tumors to these therapies. Chemoprevention is based on the inhibition of initiation and promotion stages of chemical carcinogenesis. Use of preventive agents is in its early stages and would require the general population to be screened for the presence of hepatic foci of altered hepatic cells, the precursor to hepatocellular carcinoma. Edward H. Ellis (June 26, 1821 – October 20, 1902) was the president of the California Republican Party and the editor and publisher of the San Francisco Republican, a weekly newspaper.

Life Ellis was born in Charleston, South Carolina, June 26, 1821. He was graduated from the University of South Carolina in 1841 and joined the United States Navy from March to September 1841. He was on board the "Sultana" when she was burned at sea, August 23, 1843. In 1844 Ellis came to California via the Isthmus of Panama and in the same year founded the San Francisco Republican, the first Republican paper published on the Pacific coast. On his return from Panama he was ordered to serve on the court martial of Stephen N. Field, and after the acquittal of the latter, Ellis was discharged from the Navy in April 1846. He settled in San Francisco, after he left the Navy, and was editor of the San Francisco Republican in the fall of 1845 and editor-in-chief of the Pacific Reporter, published at Sacramento City, July 1846. His brother, Congressman Robert Coppin Ellis, was editor-in-chief of the Republican from 1856 to 1861. Career President of the California Republican Party, 1851–1853 Chairman of the State Republican convention in 1851 and again in 1853. Personal life Ellis was a nephew of Richard H. Dana, a member of

The invention is particularly useful in a printing system used to print information such as product information, for example, from a remote server to large number of customers. Currently, many popular products are distributed by mail or some other means, such as a store-and-forward system, to many purchasers. For example, the purchasers of personal computers often receive a computer system after having done considerable research of various products on the market and having made a decision as to which product they wish to purchase. The purchasers are then asked to return the product to the manufacturer or retailer (e.g. a shop selling computers) where the computer is then activated and delivered to the purchaser. The retailer then mails a second package to the purchaser that includes some sort of documentation regarding the computer. The distribution of such products in this manner has several shortcomings. For example, there is a considerable time delay between the initial sale and the actual delivery of the product. Similarly, there is a considerable effort required on the part of both the manufacturer and the retailer in setting up, preparing, and stocking their respective computers. For example, a supplier may want to know the total number of computers in inventory for a particular product. The retailer may want to know the total number of computers in stock that are being shipped to customers. In addition, both the manufacturer and the retailer will have limited facilities for physically warehousing the computers once they have been prepared for sale. Furthermore, conventional personal computer distribution systems are not useful with certain products. For example, the
