EDIT: it doesn't seem to be related to acrobat reader i'm pretty sure the site has a way to make it available. EDIT2: I just download the page of my thesis/dissertation and have found and looked at the link to the Word document. A: I think this could be an attack vector. You should try a command line version of curl or wget, to see if it's a Javascript exploit. It may be because you have pop ups enabled in your browser. If you have a virus, it will almost certainly be a virus. If you had a virus it would almost certainly be on your hard drive. As has been said, it is probably that the guy and/or his girlfriend is trying to spy on you or something. A: That file is a binary PDF file, not an XPS file which appears to have been PDFXchange compatible (and is a subtype of the MIME type application/x-pdf). I suspect that this has been generated using the IIS PDF Xchangemax server. If the site has not been configured to output this file as a PDF, then it is likely that the file has been added as a link to the actual file, so it would have to be a vulnerability in Word that would allow this to happen. By my reckoning, an older MS Word could possibly send the file to your browser if you followed a link to it rather than downloading it. However, if the target file isn't available, so the link didn't work for some reason, I doubt that an MS Word of any version could have a vulnerability to allow the file to be downloaded without leaving a trace. The fact that the file would only render properly in Acrobat Reader suggests to me that the attacker may have deliberately pointed the link at a version of Acrobat Reader that doesn't keep an audit trail of file downloads. North Korea said Friday it would restart a mothballed nuclear reactor in order to use the fuel to produce a more powerful device. A U.S. diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity, told the Associated Press that a decision to resume the reactor's production was made in secret, but not without the knowledge of South Korea and China. The country has a total of five operating reactors and has struggled to harness its existing capacity, due to missile and nuclear testing and its lack of financial support.
