mask This is the third in a series of articles that look back on the problems and issues that made up British politics last year and I stick to the events and issues from last year. For a more comprehensive listing of what made up British political life in 2015 see the top part of this article. This year we had a general election, and such an election was bound to be divisive from the get-go. People were sensitive to the issues of taxes, austerity, borders, Brexit, the economy, and the future of the country. This is the time when demagogues and chancers emerge, and the strength of the politicians isn't what the public judges it to be. Throughout history, domestic affairs have never been left entirely to the government, government hasn't been entirely responsible for us. There've been centuries in which it's never really achieved anything. Until now. Welcome to Oceania. January 2016 began with the least inspiring, least guaranteed-success Labour leadership selection process ever seen in the modern era, where the majority of the country's newspapers, with the exception of the Guardian (sic), are heavily biased against Jeremy Corbyn, and with every social media account in the country beset with a slew of stories about the man who was arrogantly cheated of the chance to lead the party he founded. But as well as the sterility of the contest, it was the combination of resources thrown at the Corbyn camp and the entrenched anti-Corbyn think-tank, New Labour, that ensured Theresa May would triumph. The process meant there was no campaigning proper for just a few days (the first Tuesday in February, basically, 5.5% of the day left), then the only campaign event prior to the vote (a bomb-throwing stunt by Boris Johnson for his "Let us send a message to Brussels" campaign) was a slightly cooler version of the David Miliband and Ed Balls ad libbed footage. To not end the year on an election night was to not end the year on a whim. After a year of neo-Nazi marches and racial attack after racial attack, the results delivered the strongest moral judgement in UK electoral history. Eventually, the man in the country, waiting for an opportune moment to say he would lead the country his way, was the only man to beat the bully. And what did he bring to the table?
