Evaluation of a suboptimal home DNA extraction protocol for use in routine forensic casework. The objective of this study was to investigate whether a suboptimal home DNA extraction protocol for use in routine casework would compromise test results. Using the QIASymphony system, we extracted DNA from 223 silica packets, which had been submitted for analysis under a routine forensic casework scenario, one week after a DNA extraction method that had previously been used in casework. No significant difference was observed in the proportion of complete profiles produced by the sample (63% v. 66.4%; $p=0.24$). Our results indicate that, in the absence of additional time constraints or compromised test results, the QIASymphony system may be used in place of the standard protocol in forensic casework. The importance of parent discretion in physician-prescribed sex education and contraceptive counseling. This paper describes studies of the content of parental and other sources of information in physician-prescribed sex education and contraceptive counseling. Parents do not devote resources to raising their children to be compliant with biomedical standards of sexual behavior, nor do they seek advice about how to manage these aspects of their children's lives. Instead, parents rely heavily on the skills of physicians to bridge the gap between their own faith in traditional family values and the complexity of contemporary social life. Parents are encouraged by physicians to defer to the experience of health professionals about medical aspects of their children's lives and, in the process, are given inaccurate and misleading information about the importance of family planning and the condom in their children's lives. This paper proposes that this physician-parent interaction involves a shared, tacit agreement that the medical setting may be substituted for the home as the primary forum for addressing the sexual education and contraceptive counseling of young people. The result of this de facto substitution is a dissonance between 0cc13bf012
