I'm starting to create a site with AngularJS. Here is the deal: I'm using Dynamic content on the site. I need a place to keep hold of the content IDs and their relationships to other content. Ideally I would like to have a database table for holding this kind of information. But the Angular routing and other things I've read about seem to want that this kind of information is kept in memory only. Is there an optimal way to manage that kind of information? A: Have a look at this post Angularjs Complex table which is a good resource for how to handle such DB-related problems. Cape Sadi Cape Sadi is a promontory on the coast of Chuk

We have a customer that writes to a database. Their script submits this data to Google, and we validate the data. We used to do this by setting up a mirroring account on Google and validating the data locally. But we now need to expand this to a number of other data sources which are not locally available. I need to find a way to validate the data remotely, but I can't find anything on Google. I came up with a few ideas: Create a dummy API for the data, and validate there. But the dummy data is not validated through Google Data Studio or Google BigQuery, so that won't work. Use BigQuery Data Validation, but then I can't access the table to run the script. Is there a way to validate data remotely through Google APIs? A: Google provides the RemoteDataTools package to do exactly that: I am not familiar with the API, but this looks like a package you can install locally and run from your own machine. Surface binding kinetics of TAP-like protein 1 to various AP-1-DNA structures. TAP-like protein 1 (TLP-1), a TAP-related protein in cytoplasm, has been identified as a component of the antigen peptide (Ag-p) transporter that is required for efficient Ag presentation by APCs. In this study, we attempted to elucidate the molecular mechanism of TLP-1 recognition 1cdb36666d
