Did you know that in India condoms are used for birth control purposes? I think it's safe to say that this is not a concept foreign to anyone, especially in the U.S. A recent article (again from Jezebel.com) discussed a bill in California to better regulate sexuality. The author feels that sex ed is too repressed in schools. In this blog I would like to discuss the issue of condoms in the U.S. Instead of delving deeply into whether this bill should be allowed or not, I decided to look into the concept of birth control and condoms more. Condoms Condoms are used for quite a variety of things in the world. They are used as contraceptives, STD's (Sexually Transmitted Diseases) condoms or barrier devices, products to prevent pregnancy, and more. Condoms are made from latex (goeindoploys.org). A lot of other condoms exist in the world, some of them may be transparent, thin, and be made of other materials such as natural latex, a natural gel, rubber, or nitrile (goeindoploys.org). Some may even be latex-free. For the purpose of discussion, I will be utilizing a gender neutral term, condom, and not be that precise about which condoms, or latex or non-latex. Birth control The main purpose of a condom as I discussed earlier is to prevent pregnancy. But condoms also prevent STD's. Sex without a condom puts you at risk of infections, and regardless of whether you are using a latex or non-latex
