But this inexhaustible source is also a beast that is capable of great harm if it is allowed to run loose. The runaway steel that periodically ravages India and China, after being sown by careless farmers and careless governments, is a dramatic and painful reminder of the perils inherent in the rational pursuit of prosperity. In such a setting we are often tempted to look to non-rational solutions--to harness the beast by bringing on board another monster of our own invention, or to regulate and restrain it through the agency of the state. Such strategies, however, are ill-conceived and miss the mark. A good example of such ill-conceived ideas comes from India's best-known advocate of the vegetarian diet, which he claims can cure all disease, including the common cold and even cancer. But this argument is actually a non sequitur. The "vegetarian diet" associated with India's Padmasana (lotus) religion, and some other Hindu sects, is actually nothing more than a strict vegetarian diet, and it is not based on any concrete scientific basis. Nor is the argument that the diet may cause cancer to have any substance. One of the first physicians to investigate the vegetarian diet was Dr. Charaka, who lived and worked in ancient India (sixth century B.C.). He concluded that "vegetables and fruits are necessary for
