Conclusions ===== In the last decade, the field of microgravity recordings of seismic waves has gained a lot of interest in order to improve our knowledge on the coupling between the crust and mantle of the Earth. Moreover, the understanding of the seismic wave propagation in the crust might help in the interpretation of the seismic sources located in the mantle. In the present work, we evaluated the effectiveness of the VLF and SH recordings obtained by the VLF and CSR sounding experiment, respectively, to detect the seismic waves propagating in the crust. We first evaluated the signals recorded in the VLF and CSR data sets using an autocorrelation technique. The analysis of the two-dimensional cross-correlation maps between the surface recorded signals (i.e. the VLF and CSR data) and the three-dimensional seismograms allowed us to discover the presence of “noise-paved” shear wave reflections at the surface (i.e. at the edges of the experimental sites) and the presence of more “paved” shear wave reflections within the crust. Moreover, we found that the travel times of the shear waves detected in the VLF and CS
