However, the routine use of prophylactic radiotherapy in rectal cancer patients does not seem to reduce overall rectal cancer recurrence. Instead, the risk of rectal cancer recurrence increases slightly. Most patients with stage I rectal cancer were recommended postoperative radiotherapy in the CROSS trial, and those with node-positive rectal cancer were recommended radiotherapy in the Dutch trial. Therefore, patients with rectal cancer who underwent surgery are likely to receive postoperative radiotherapy. Future trials are needed to evaluate the effect of radiotherapy on the risk of recurrence. The ability of the pathological complete response to predict patient prognosis is yet d0c515b9f4

A little history on our site here at the Molly Webster Center. For years, we were "building" our Web site. There were several proposed designs over a 6 month period, none of which achieved our goals. Through these years, I had been working on a master site plan that was a bit too ambitious and time-consuming.

One of our members was a graphic artist. In the spring of 2010, he came to the side of our site, looked at the building and declared, "I could help you with this building," and for the next six months, my best friend and business partner put together an awesome design and created the actual site. The site opened in May of 2011 and you can still see most of the work that went into the two plans and the final result on the site. It is our belief that these plans helped provide us with a strong foundation for the future of the Web site. We have a hard deadline for our first social media plan, so it is time to get back to it and build the plan for after the Web site is launched. A

Q: Bytecode related performance differences: simple instructions vs instructions that read and write memory

I want to be able to understand the performance differences of an instruction with L1 cache hits versus an instruction that causes a write to L2 cache and reads the value in the cache. That is, I would like to know the performance difference between the following two instructions (where 0, 0, 0 is in L1): `mov 0, 0, 0`
