Citation required for some types of academic writing, especially scholarly works. To quote Wikipedia, "Citation is a short phrase or sentence that provides the source for a quotation." As a rule, you must provide the page number, or a book and edition number if published in book form, for quotations in an academic paper. Quotations can come in pairs of two, one from each side of an "equals" sign. There are exceptions to the rule, however, and you might not need to provide the source for your quotations. However, if you are citing a quotation that is part of an extensive body of information, such as a report or encyclopedia article, you may need to provide the citation. A teacher's guide for the Understanding Earth textbook is also available. It includes sample questions and an answer key. Quotations can be edited as needed. This is standard practice for any academic paper. There are several citation styles. To help you choose the right one for your paper, you can review the information at the bottom of this page. It looks like most academic papers adhere to the Chicago Manual of Style. You may find the information in this article helpful in deciding which style is best for your paper. The materials and project materials for this educator's guide are on the Understanding Earth website. There is also a web tutorial for this project. There is information about the project at the Understanding Earth website. The Washington State Department of Ecology did a very extensive review of the design of the Earth science materials in eighth grade. The findings of their review are included in the preceding sentences. You may visit their review on the Washington State Department of Ecology website. They made changes based on their findings. The overall grade is based on work done before and after the project. Teachers must use work done before the project to develop the project and using work done after the project to evaluate the project. You may visit the WSDOE website for more information about this project and other projects. Questioners who evaluate the work in the end of the project have the opportunity to indicate the level of understanding on a four point scale with options for 1, 2, 3, and 4. However, it is important to note that the grade is not based on a single test. It is the cumulative score on multiple work projects over the course of the year. The Washington State Department of Ecology has posted the teacher's guide for this project and
