Malwarebytes Anti-Malware. Bile lactate dehydrogenase and glutathione transferases in cholestasis. Liver glutathione peroxidase (GPx) activity did not vary in uraemic patients before and after haemodialysis, but GPx activity was reduced by at least 50% after end of haemodialysis. Depletion of hepatic glutathione did not correlate with reduced liver GPx activity. Liver bile fraction aldehyde dehydrogenase (ALDH) activity was significantly (P less than 0.05) reduced (by 23%) in uraemic patients. Bile fractions from uraemic patients contained three times the lactate dehydrogenase activity (LDH) compared to bile of the same patients before haemodialysis. This was due to an increase in LDH of cholestatic liver. LDH activity in bile did not correlate with levels of total GPx activity or bilirubin (Bil), nor with the activities of ALDH, cytochrome p450 and cytochrome b5. In rats with obstructive jaundice induced by a ligation of the common bile duct (CBD) enzyme activities of bile LDH, GPx, ALDH, cytochrome P450 and cytochrome b5 were significantly reduced, but GPx activity did not correlate with bile LDH activity. The above results indicate that increased hepatic LDH may be a common feature of cholestasis due to both human and experimental cholestasis.
