Hence I must say that The Age of Irrationality has many labels but could not be called any popular school of thought. In fact if we see the events that have led the participants in this 'school of thought' to come into existence we can see many hallmarks of the postmodern era. Various 'social' concerns are no longer a concern for people since they have been in constant pursuit of their academic agenda. Hence also the great attention they give to identity. I must also confess that I am no more any postmodernist. I started my academic career after the revolution of 68. I joined political activism after the horrors of the Israeli Occupation of Palestine. I found the new social order and its value system grossly unpleasant. The French concept of justice and equality did not appeal to me. Even the democratic system was contrary to what I held dear. In my mind, the contemporary social order was a "debased culture." I tried to change society in my environment. But that turned out to be a fool's errand since that the very tenets of critical thought is flawed. Any direct attempt to change the social order is a fool's errand and will only result in failure. I decided to leave academics and turn my attention to activism. Since I am not one of the aforementioned SOWs, my social activism must do the work of the SOWs when they try to undermine the capitalist order. I must admit that I was never very concerned about identity. A defined group identity based on ethnicity or religion seemed to me an affront to the very nature of the individual. The so called feminist movement is a prime example of identity based on ideology. Where men are concerned or even men and women, feminists just happen to be special. My social activism was not based on identity. It was more of an activist humanism based on the premise of "Not only is my life and freedom worth defending, but so is the life and freedom of everyone else." The feminist movement has become the latest attempt to promote this social ordering by means of socialist measures. They are now working on restoring the gender hierarchy of the family.
