Blood stasis is one of the three pathophysiological reasons of cancer development, and its interactions with the three other pathophysiological causes have been suggested. Although five risk factors of stasis syndrome have been generally recognized (high alcohol intake, deficiency of a liver detoxifying substance, persistent or excessive tobacco use, and low dietary fiber and vegetable intake), various epidemiological studies suggest that the analysis should be focused on stress and negative mood. The cause of blood stasis, however, is still controversial. Some reports have shown the cause to be various and the association to the three pathophysiological causes to be weak. This review discusses the pathophysiological basis of cancer development, particularly focusing on blood stasis. Introduction Cancer, not disease, has been the most common cause of death in the Western world for the past few centuries. Recently, the incidence of cancer has been rising with increased life expectancy and industrialisation and therefore, the need to examine the history of this disease is crucial in order to understand its evolution. The major part of the research includes the length of time, course of the disease and causes and treatments (Lewis, 2008). In the event that it is wished to do the research on the causes and treatments, the first thing 6d1f23a050
