The Guangdong new center of concentrated hot-loving bacteria can last for 10,000 years, helping the province residents save thousands of yuan every year. As the world's population grows, the energy consumption also grows. Thermal energy can be converted into electricity by plants, burning waste materials, but the process needs large amounts of energy. So, the application of electricity to heat related matters has become a trend. This is also an energy-saving way. A report by the China National Bureau of Statistics says that the number of women and children, their labor force participation rate, and the ability of the elderly to work, are still quite different from those of men and children. As a result, the support rate of the current Chinese public pension system is
