the city's high-tech and freewheeling capitalism has also made it a target of Chinese capital controls and a place where mainlanders can find relatively lax investment restrictions. Hong Kong is also a well-connected transport hub for Southeast Asia. In recent years, Hong Kong has begun taking proactive steps to diversify its economy and increase its share of global trade. This has included tax policy changes and a strong focus on tourism, but since the ouster of the city's last democratically elected leader in 2014, Beijing has increasingly made it harder for Hong Kong to maintain its autonomy. Along with Taiwan, Hong Kong is one of the only two major democracies in Chinese-ruled territory. Unlike Taiwan, however, it remains an important trading partner and financial hub for the mainland. A city with a population of about 7 million people, Hong Kong is in the eastern part of mainland China. Its special administrative status was granted by Britain in its final years as a colony, and it operates under a system of rule known as Chapter 1, which includes a high degree of autonomy. For decades, the city's political system has been a hybrid of British law and Chinese law. In practice, this has made it very difficult to make laws that are legally binding in Hong Kong, and it has allowed the city to preserve a high degree of autonomy while not giving up significant parts of its legal system. This has also helped maintain its distinctiveness. Hong Kong also has a court of final appeal, which is the final court of appeal for civil and criminal cases that cannot be appealed to a higher court. The court of final appeal consists of five justices. The highest court in Hong Kong is the court of appeal, which hears cases from the lower courts. The court of final appeal has the authority to overturn the court of appeal. Since Hong Kong is a British colony, its law is based on English common law and the law of the United Kingdom. Several high-profile British cases were heard in Hong Kong, including the long-running Agnew and Ann Chao v. Immigration Tribunal case. The Beijing government has also actively sought to limit the power of Hong Kong courts, but it has been unable to eliminate the judicial power completely. As a result, Hong Kong has become a center for litigation against China in international courts.
